Caring for the ‘helping professions’—can the risk of suicide be reduced?

Annually, over one million people worldwide take their life by suicide. In Australia, suicide is the leading cause of death in young adults.

Are healthcare professionals equally at risk?

How can we reduce the risk of suicide in the community, and does this same approach apply to the mental health of healthcare professionals?

Can we be more compassionate and increase awareness of those within the healthcare community who are at risk?
